The one interface I always find most confusing in Photoshop is the Layers panel. Instead of the familiar on/off layers adjustment toggle, it's set up in such a way that it makes it very easy to mix sliders together. You can also drag grouped things off to a new sheet. As for duplicate layers, it doesn't even repeat the names: A layer that you already named as \"A-1\" will get a little arrow on the tool bar, just like layers in Illustrator; you need to change the name for that one. The Content Aware Fill feature lets you remove unwanted objects from a picture without retouching or resizing. It works with shapes, text and objects that seem to be in the foreground of the image. You select a portion of the picture, press the Content Aware Fill button, and it comes up with something similar to Photoshop's Auto Color Refine in the Clarity panel. You can preview the output in the Clarity panel and then drag the crop around the thumbnails so you get an idea of how it will look. By using an automatic preset, you can get a pretty good result in very little time. you can open image files, import digital negatives, apply adjustments, and produce panoramas. Layer styles works as before for drawing layer styles on new layers, you can also create a selection from one layer that includes the other layers on the same image and activate it in the Layers Panel. They also have a storyboard feature similar to Photoshop, but you can switch to directly edit a frame using HD video editing tools. They also have several photo features, including automatic exposure, white balance, and color correction, plus features to help you work with RAW files.

The new Content Aware Scaling can accurately align the content in an approximately straight line, even if it contains curved or angled objects. It works by finding the optimal path between the object itself and the outside black border, then uses the corresponding path profile as the new crop window. (See this image:)

- The ProPhoto RGB and sRGB color spaces represent the colors a display supports and the colors a camera captures, respectively. Standard Apple displays widely use the sRGB space, based on the color profiles that are designed for web applications.

- The Adobe RGB and Rec. 709 color spaces capture the colors that are found on a wide range of display technologies, including short-wavelength light-emitting diode (LED) displays. They are also the default colorspace for many high-quality film-based cameras. The new Smart Levels feature enhances the Levels tool. It automatically works as a Lens Blur filter and, depending on the amount of focus on an object, adjusts the Brightness and Saturation of the foreground and background. The new Auto Mask feature intelligently handles object silhouettes by detecting the exact edges of likely foreground and background regions and automatically generates masks. Other cool features include: The key to that approach is the addition of support for writing SceneML files to describe 3D scenes, and given the prevalence of open scenario engines and packaging tools in the production pipeline, this approach begins to make a lot of sense. Both Photoshop and the Substance line have set a new direction for what is possible in 3D authoring and editing. Consistent with this change, the Photoshop CC 2019 release removes support for the legacy “3D” features in both the PSD and Photoshop UI, and instead replaces it with the following new 3D capabilities.
